A Prayer.

BY ELIZADETH M. SARGEANT. If I have erred in groping for the light, That streameth from the far off golden portals, Chasing the shapows from the guilty night,
That broadeth o'er the tribe of erring mortals;

If I have grasped at shadowy forms and fair
That fit in wildering grace above, around me,
Thinking the true, the bright, the good were there.
Nor so't to break this spell in which they bound me, Father! forgive me.

If I have ever found a bitter tear Coursing down cheeks with sin or sorrow paling.

Prismatic glory through the grief-drops falling;

If I have heard amid life's human choir, One tone with sorrow's numistaken quiver. And touched all carelessly, the auswering lyre, Causing sweet strings at the rude touch to shiver, Father! forgive me.

If I have ever turned with withering scoru To consure ill, mistuken or designing, And drank not patiently the bitter cup And drank not paliently the bitter cup
Which thou in love hast proffered, unrepining:
If I have learned not from earth's Holiest One
To bear its thousand ills, its wrongs, its sorrow,
As but the darkness fleeing from the day,
The dusky herald of a glorious morrow.

Father! forgive me.

And oh! if I have ever caused a sigh, In any heart my own had loved to cherish, Among the hopes of immortality Unwilhering joys, when all around shall perish; Forgive me this;—for all unwittingly Was every tho'tless deed, each light word spoken; But teurs, which we bid flow, tell of deep founta
